

BULLIES

by Ed Wicke

A book that's serious about bullying. But CRAZY about everything else.

For all the children I've entertained with stories since this book was first published.

1 Alexander the Great

The car swung round the corner in little jerks, like an old man on roller-skates for the first time. My mother peered nervously over the steering wheel at the school that crouched above us on the hilltop, all yellow and black like an angry wasp, or like a hungry tiger slumbering in the late October sunshine. I tried to explain this to her but she wasn't listening to me. As usual!

'You will remember to give my letter to the Headteacher, won't you?' my mother asked with a frown. 'It explains why I can't come see him on your first day.'

'Yes, Mother!' I sighed, trying to make the sigh as small as possible.

I pulled the letter from the pocket of my baggy, faded second-hand school trousers which matched the second-hand school sweatshirt with sleeves that were too long. I read the name "Mr Prossy" in my mother's tiny, timid handwriting – and then it was snatched from my hand by the grubby, grabbing fingers of my crazy four-year-old sister Brenda, who was on the car seat beside me.

Brenda doesn't think schools are wasps or tigers. She believes they are fairytale lands full of games and frolics and heavenly delight. She whispered in my ear so that it tickled: 'Give Mister Bossy Mummy's lettuce to put on his head so she can't see him!'

This was her version of what my mother had said, but since Brenda was having a lisping day it came out as 'Give Mithter Boththy Mummy'th lettuth...'

The car gave an old man's cough as it rattled through the rusty white gates that gaped at us with bloodstained tiger's teeth. As it faltered to a wheezing stop, I was alarmed to see my mother unfastening her seatbelt.

'You don't have to get out!' I exclaimed while I tried to get my door open quickly. But she was already stepping out of the car and looking about her with a bright, motherly smile and cooing in a bright, motherly way about the loveliness of it all.

I glanced at the three large boys who stood lazily in the main doorway, their eyes running over the babbling stream that flowed into Newton Primary School. My mother was still talking, and doing it far too loudly:

'Oh - and Alexander - tell your teacher I'll come see her as soon as I've got an afternoon free!'

It was no good reminding her that I wanted to be called Alex - she would stop and puzzle out loud why I insisted on being Alex when dear Granddaddy was Alexander, and how my father had been so pleased when I was named after his father, and ever since my father died she had looked upon me as her Dear Grown Boy and - anyway, she would go on for a long time about this, loudly and in front of everyone!

She took me right up to the school door. I gave her a quick kiss on the cheek and was turning to go inside when she called after me, 'Dear Alexander! Be good, my precious!'

There was a snort from one of the three boys. As my mother turned back to the car, he exclaimed to the others, 'Alexander?! The name's bigger than he is!'

I walked inside quietly, pretending I'd heard nothing. But it was no good...

Close Encounter of a Bullying Kind

'You! New boy!' cried the biggest boy, a long finger hooked towards my eyes. 'Come here! What's your name? How old are you? What class are you in?'

I walked back, composing my face into a respectful blank. I said I was just ten years old, I was starting the fifth year... and my name was Alex. They laughed.

'Come on, mummy's boy! What's your name really? You can tell us!' one of them sneered.

'It's the same as it was a moment ago,' I promised. 'It's Alex!' I gave them a friendly smile. They didn't smile back.

'But your dear mummy called you something else,' the large boy said, in the sort of voice some people use for talking to babies. 'Can't you remember your real name? It was Dear something, wasn't it?'

The shortest and fattest of the three interrupted. 'No, Simon! He's called "Be good my precious!". Didn't you hear his dear mummy call him that?' He laughed and elbowed the third boy. 'That's his real name, isn't it, Grabber?'

'Wrong, Cubs!' said the middle-sized sharp-faced boy. 'He can't afford decent clothes and his mother can't afford a decent car, but he's still a great man, you know!' He sneered down at me. 'Alexander the Great!'

The AAABST

I know almost everything there is to know about bullies, through hard experience.

I used to think that other kids were making a big fuss over nothing when they complained about being picked on. I thought they shouldn't take it so seriously. Most of the time you just have to put up with a bit of pushing and name-calling. That's life. But then I learned what it feels like to be bullied seriously....

You see, my father died a few years ago and after that my mother couldn't settle. So we moved from place to place, looking for a home she felt happy in. By the time I was ten, I'd been to five schools and had been bullied by some of the most talented and dedicated bullies in the universe! They seemed to home in on me: I suppose it was because I was small and wasn't from their village. And wearing glasses didn't help.

And how I hated it. What I wanted most of all was to exterminate the lot of them! I remember how scared and sick and angry I sometimes felt. I even pretended to be ill so I wouldn't have to go to school.

But I realised I had to learn how to survive them - so I became the world's expert at bully-busting. The Alex Adams Advanced Bully Survival Techniques made me invincible! At least....

... At least, that's what I thought. I was about to find out how wrong I could be!

Just now I was applying AAABST number 4: "Understand and Avoid". If you want to avoid being picked on, you need to understand the bullies. For instance, I'd discovered that there are three main bully types, and if you know which type you're dealing with, you have a better chance of outwitting him or her.

Donkeys

Donkeys are tall and strong and very, very stubborn. They're really good at sports and most of them are pretty good at talking too: so grown-ups think they're wonderfully mature and let the donkeys get away with their bully tricks. They laugh loudly and they especially like to laugh at other people. They can't stand to lose, ever!

The best way to avoid being thumped by a Donkey is not to annoy him. A Donkey likes to be spoken to politely and treated as if he's a little bit special. He wants you to tell him how great he is. But if he thinks you need putting in your place, you're dead meat.

Piggy Thumpers

Piggies are broad and stupid and very tough. Their fists may look like lumps of dough, but they feel like concrete blocks! They don't understand jokes, so don't tell them any because they'll think you're making fun of them. And they don't care for intelligent arguments either. It doesn't help to say things like 'Why are you picking on me?' They'll just laugh and hit you harder.

Piggies thump everyone within reach - just out of habit! - so the best way to deal with Piggies is to keep away from them. Since they move slowly, this is easy to do: nine times out of ten, anyway. But watch out for the tenth time!

Weasels

Weasels can be any size and shape. They love to play nasty tricks, tell cruel jokes, spread lies and get people into trouble. They like to hurt people when no one is watching. They're clever at anything they want to do. Never argue with a Weasel: you will lose.

The only way to avoid being hurt by a Weasel is to never meet one.

Bully Helpers

Bullies usually have helpers. There are:

Slimers who tell them how wonderful they are.

Squealers who spy for them.

Stinkers who follow close behind the bullies, like vultures following the wolves, and kick you when you're down.

When a bully has enough helpers, he can make life pretty nasty for you.

So here I was at this new school, and I'd met three top-rank bullies in the first minute! For a crazy moment I imagined flinging myself at the three and making them pay for poking fun at my mother, but I knew how that would end!

So instead of breaking my scrawny fist on a bully's iron stomach, and then getting my face flattened and my ears stretched to the size of two matching pancakes – instead of that, I went to deliver my mother's letter.

It seemed the safer thing to do.

There were some promising doors to my right, and I knocked at the one labelled:

Mr Prossy

An old, tall, severe man opened the door. His face was long and bony, with cold, sunken eyes and the stony gaze of a freshly-wakened funeral undertaker. A long, fleshless hand with plenty of veins on it slid towards me. In a quavering voice - high, echoing and very refined - he asked if I was Adams. I nodded.

'Well, come in then, boy!' he exclaimed with sudden ghastly friendliness, making me jump. He spread a gruesome smile for me, with all his teeth showing like tombstones on a gummy hill. Then his face resumed its serious look as he beckoned to the tall, muscular Donkey by the main door.

'Cobbett - come join us while I explain the gground wules to this noble initiate!' he commanded. He added in a quieter tone for my ears that Simon Cobbett was Head Boy and Captain of Games and a Fwightfully Fine Chap and Good Fwiend to Have.

I nodded dismally. 'I'm sure he's a delightful fellow in his way,' I said.

Mr Prossy nodded his head a dozen times, like a string puppet with a loose joint. He grinned at me again, so I grinned back: but my heart wasn't in it.

Cobbett strode over to us in that relaxed, strong manner that Donkeys have. Mr Prossy had finished chilling my hand with his cold, bony, long-fingered dead man's grip and he passed it over to Cobbett to mangle in a proper knuckle-cruncher of a handshake.

'Don't hurt him, Cobbett!' the old man squawked nervously as my face went white. He confided proudly to me, 'That boy doesn't know his own strength!'

'I think I know it,' I muttered, rubbing my hand. I sat in the chair indicated by a limp wave of the Head's arm. Cobbett yawned and leaned against the wall. He flexed a bicep lazily, just to keep in practice for the next handshake.

Mr Prossy sat himself carefully in his black leather recliner and folded his hands together beneath his chin while he rolled his eyes to the ceiling as if to read his speech from it.

I can't remember much of the talk - it was all the usual Headteacher stuff about running a happy school and every boy and girl Doing Their Bit, Working Hard and Playing Hard, too.

'There's never any twouble about discipline, is there, Cobbett?' he asked the Head Boy, rolling his eyes down again, like roller-blinds dropping. He said it with a little laugh and added, 'Cobbett sees to it that no one steps out of line! No pwoblems, Cobbett?'

'Nothing I can't handle, Mr Prossy,' the boy replied, with a smile that would have stripped wallpaper. He turned it on me. 'We run a tight ship, Adams! Everyone knows his place, or else walks the plank, you know!'

"Dweadful boy!" laughed Mr Prossy uncertainly, remonstrating with a long, crooked finger. 'You mustn't say such things, you know. Someone will think you're serious! What will you suggest next - keelhauling?'

Cobbett looked genuinely interested. He rubbed his chin and puzzled aloud, 'Well now, that's an idea I'd not considered yet, sir...'

'... Come on, Adams, don't be all day about it!' Cobbett hurried me along the corridor. He was tall and broad with short brown curly hair, and he walked so fast that I had to jog to keep up with him. 'There's your classroom, number four. Hang up your bag and coat outside. And Adams -'

'Yes?'

'Don't run in the corridors!' He made a face at me and left, his heavy shoes thumping on the green linoleum.

Teachers

I stood with my knuckles poised to knock, wondering about my new teacher. Now, there are too many types of teacher for anyone to list. For a start there are:

Trendies, friendies, shouters, clouters, smellies, bigbellies, jollies, dollies, cold oldies, silly fillies, game-contrivers, slave-drivers, mutterers, flutterers, thunderers, blunderers, breezy-and-brighters, dull-as-nighters, Crabby grabbers, kind minders, smilers, frowners, uppers and downers.

The Alex Adams Teacher Classification System allows you to mix these together, so you might end up with a Trendy Dolly Slave-Driver, or a Game-Contriving Muttering Old Frowner! The worst type I have met is the Dimwitted Thundering Blunderer, who makes mistakes and then blames you for them, blasting you out of your seat with sound; but that's another story...

Miss Spade

Miss Spade, my new teacher, was none of these. She had red hair that wouldn't stay in place and large, soft orange freckles over as much of her as you could see. I used to wonder whether she had them everywhere. Her eyes were large and blue and always seemed to be puzzling over something.

I suppose it was us they were puzzling about! We must have been her first class, because from time to time she would stop in the middle of telling us something, with the air of a new mother pausing halfway through putting on a nappy and wondering whether it was perhaps upside-down.

When I knocked on the door of her classroom, she paused just like I said, left her sentence hanging in the moist autumn air, and came to open the door. Her red eyebrows swung upwards as I stammered out my name, and she read the Headteacher's note with her lips moving, as if to be sure of the words.

'Alexander?' she whispered doubtfully, reading the full name that the Head had insisted on writing. One eyebrow was raised now, and she gave me a quizzical look that made me giggle. I said "Alex" was better, and she nodded delightfully.

She shooed me inside and announced, 'Children - this is Alex. He is ten years old, like most of you. He will be in Red group, and will sit at the front, just here by Natalie. Is that all right, Natalie? You'll have to move your desk a frog's hop to the right. Make that three hops. Unless it's a gruesomely big frog. Good! Sit down, Alex. I'll find you some books and a pencil in a moment. We were just discussing the best way to start a project on weather.'

The Class

Oh, we were a puzzle to her, right enough! Some days, it must have been like finding buttons in the charity box, or looking down and discovering that you were wearing one blue sock, and one orange. For example, there was Fred Rumble who knew everything about spiders, including the bits you'd rather he left out. Marvin Pyle could make bird noises so realistic that the birds would come over to peer at him. Helen Welther was the best footballer in the school, better even than Cobbett. Najeen Shahn was a whiz on the piano. And now there was me, the world's expert on bullies. However, no one knew this yet!

When I met my mother at the school gate that afternoon, I told her all the good things she wanted to hear and left out the parts that might upset her. She was too easy to upset anyway, just at the moment.

Brenda asked, 'What about the lettuce on Mr Bossy's head? Did it fall off?'

'Well, Brenda,' I told her, 'poor Mr Prossy has only one ear and a wooden leg. He used to be a pirate, you see, but he had to retire when he got to be eighty, so they made him a Headteacher instead!'

'Poor man!' said Brenda soulfully. 'Having to become a teacher after being something good like a pirate!'

'He doesn't mind,' I said. 'He still keeps a bloody cat o'nine tails – you know, a pirate whip - in his desk drawer, and he has an evil one-legged parrot at home to guard his second-best eye-patch.'

She believed me.
